HISTORY LOVE

Roger Conley was the most studious boy in Central High. Not that he was the greasy grind type—he was interested in knowledge, to the exclusion of things which interested most boys of his age. For instance, he didn't give a darn about athletics, and cared even less about girls. But he changed his mind on the girl score when Margie Britton registered as Central. Margie was something new in the way of girls. Take the trimmest of figures, and hers was trimmer. The bluest of eyes—hers were bluer. In fact, Margie was altogether beautiful. So much so that only one glance, and Roger was lost. The boy who'd only been entranced by the arts and sciences was hopelessly in love!

"Hopelessly" was right—for how did anybody like Roger rate such a gal as Margie? He was no smoothie—he had no line whatsoever. Good-looking? Not a bit of it. Athletic? Not Roger! He didn't have a jalopy, and generally dressed like Sloppy Joe himself. But that didn't stop him from dreaming—and all his dreams were of Margie. Oh, he knew that he didn't stand a chance—particularly after Ace Daly entered the lists. Ace was the hero of Central High School, and well he knew it. He was captain of the football team, brawny and handsome, and dressed like an Esquire fashion plate. No, he didn't have a jalopy—just a brand new Jaguar, that was all! He was confident, poised, assured—with a line that had the coeds swooning. At first sight, he knew that Margie was for him. And when he moved in, everybody else dropped out, knowing full well what a waste of time it was to compete with Ace! Only Roger remained in the competition—but nobody knew it. He was too shy to speak up or make his presence felt, and only he knew the message of his beating heart.

Came the day when Roger summoned up all of his courage, and bought Margie a malt at the Sweet Tooth. She was sipping it demurely while Roger gazed at her soulfully — when Ace entered the shop. Why, the nerve of this drip, trying to make time with his girl! The bookworm—the class poet, of all things! Ace sent his prize glare in Roger's direction, but Roger was so immersed in his adoration that it didn't penetrate. "I've just been telling about the awful trouble I've been having in history," explained Margie to Ace. "Try as I do, I just can't remember the date of the Magna Carta—and they're sure to ask it in the final exam! If—if there were only some way that I could remember it!"

"Did I ever tell you about the time I ran 103 yards for a touchdown?" asked Ace. "Yessir, it was the longest individual run that—"

But at this point, Roger had the temerity to interrupt. "Er—I've thought of a way you could remember that date, Margie," he said. "It's a poem I made up—listen!

You can be smarter
By using your bean.
Lunch — Magna Carta —
Both twelve fifteen!"

"Why, that's wonderful!" cried Margie. "Twelve fifteen—the very time of the school lunch, bell! I'll never forget it now—and I'll never forget the clever way you helped me! Gee, thanks, Roger!"

Abashed, Roger excused himself and left—but Ace was right behind him. No sooner had they gotten outside when Roger found himself downed by a terrific uppercut. "That's for showin' off in front of my girl—and makin' me look bad!" Ace growled—then recoiled as a human whirlwind flew from the Sweet Tooth. It was Margie, transformed by what she had seen into a virtual spitfire. Nobody had ever dared tell off Ace Daly before—but the undiluted fury of this lovely girl sent him slinking from the scene. And now Margie was kneeling at Roger's side, dabbing tenderly at his bruises.

"You—you sent Ace away!" said Roger unbelievably. "And he's the greatest catch on the campus! You did that—for me? Why, he'd have taken you anywhere—I don't get it!"

"I never thought the smartest boy in Central High could be such a dope!" murmured Margie. "Who cares about a football captain —when she's got a chance at the class poet?"

Strange EPIDEMIC

"Dad, I've come to you for a professional consultation," said young Dr. Manners.

"Always glad to help out a fellow physician," said old Dr. Manners, his eyes twinkling. "Don't tell me you've run into a problem!"

"Not just a simple problem, dad. I'm very much afraid that Cartertown is in for an epidemic!"

The eyes of Dr. Manners, Sr., widened with concern as his son told the facts. It had all begun when Mrs. Johnson had called him in to diagnose the sudden ailment which had overtaken her son Tom, a teen-ager. The symptoms were strange—loss of appetite, an inability to concentrate and an acute melancholy expressing itself in constant sighs. The symptoms didn't fit any known ailment, and while young Dr. Manners was still pondering the possibilities, he was called in to treat Phil Carren. The same age—and the same symptoms! In rapid succession came Howie Foster, Rick Brent and Frank Lennox. All teen-agers—and again, the same strange ailment. And in recent days, the sickness seemed to have mushroomed, affecting large numbers of youths between the ages of sixteen and eighteen. In every case, that loss of appetite, that inability to concentrate, that acute melancholy. "Not much doubt about its being an epidemic, is there?" asked young Dr. Manners worriedly. "Here, take a look at these case histories and tell me what you think!"

His father ruffled through the papers. "Hmmm . . . all these cases situated in about the same area in town," he said slowly. "But that's the way it is with epidemics. Better give me a day or two to do a little scouting on my own, and then we'll take this up again!"

Actually, it went faster than that. The very next day, old Dr. Manners entered his son's office. "About that—er—epidemic," he said. "You know, after you left me yesterday, I got to thinking. It seemed to me I remembered just that combination of symptoms in a disease you once suffered from! Think back, son—to when you were seventeen! I remember a certain period when I was worried sick about you! You didn't have a shred of appetite and you couldn't concentrate on anything! You'd just look off into space—and keep on sighing—"

"Nonsense!" said Dr. Manners, Jr. "I couldn't have been like any of the patients I've been having recently! I'm telling you that we're confronted with an epidemic!"

"Maybe," said his father. "But just come with me, won't you? Something I'd like to show you!"

They stopped in front of the old building which housed District High School. It was the end of the school day, and pupils were pouring from the doors. As they watched, just about the prettiest coed in history stepped out. She had the sort of figure that poets rave about, a wealth of softly-curling blonde hair and flirtatious brown eyes that held a rare sparkle. She had charm, and she knew it. So did the crowd of boys that surrounded her, hanging on her every word and whim. Confident of their admiration and abject slavery, she paid them little attention. And there was something similar about all these boys—the air that a certain out-of-this-world attraction was far more important than worldly things like appetite—a certain hopeless staring into space at anything except those golden curls—and you could almost hear those melancholy sighs!

"I figured out it might be something like this when I noted that your cases all came from this neighborhood," said old Dr. Manners. "And I remembered way back to when you'd gone to this very school! Like I said, you'd suffered from these very same symptoms—and I'd tracked them down to a certain coed back in those days! Remember Carol Roberts, son? Well—this is her daughter!"
